Abstract. This article examines the evolution of syntax in creole languages, tracing the historical and linguistic factors that contribute to their development. Through comparative linguistic analysis, the study identifies unique syntactic structures in creole languages that differentiate them from their parent languages. The paper explores the process of creolization, focusing on how syntactic features are influenced by language contact, simplification, and innovation. The findings offer insights into the adaptive nature of language and its ability to evolve in multilingual environments, highlighting the significance of creole studies in understanding linguistic diversity and change.

Introduction: Creole languages present a fascinating case of linguistic evolution through contact and innovation. This paper seeks to unravel the syntactic evolution observed in creole languages, highlighting the distinct structures that arise from the creolization process. Drawing upon a variety of linguistic theories and comparative analyses, the study examines how creole languages diverge syntactically from their parent languages due to factors such as language contact, simplification mechanisms, and innovative linguistic adaptation. The research contributes to broader discussions on language evolution by offering a detailed examination of how syntax in creole languages embodies both historical influences and contemporary dynamics. Such insights are vital for linguists aiming to understand the resilience and adaptability of human language.
